

Oral History Project: Hospital Art, Architecture & Design

Sensing Spaces of Healthcare: Rethinking the NHS Hospital

Have you been involved in NHS hospital art, interior design, object design/making, or architecture at any point since 1948? If so the 'Sensing Spaces of Healthcare: Rethinking the NHS Hospital' project would very much like to hear from you. This exciting oral history research project is currently running at the History Department at the University of Bristol, conducted by Dr Victoria Bates.

Dr Bates would like to interview people who have played a key role in designing hospitals over the course of the NHS: from beds to buildings!

The research project aims to explore the history of hospitals through the senses, and we want to hear from the people who designed and built them. Interviews will contribute toward a number of historical publications, and be part of a public archive.

If you are interested in being interviewed or would like more information about this oral history project, please visit the project website <https://hospitalsenses.co.uk> and sign up via the 'Share Your Memories' page. You will then be contacted to arrange a suitable time and place for an interview and sent more details on the project and the interview itself. You can also return the form below or contact Dr Bates if you have any questions (victoria.bates@bristol.ac.uk).

Thank you very much for any time you can spare for this research project.
